How Rural Church Can Solve Problems

Editor's Note: The following article on some of the problems of the rural church is by Lewis G. Wells, nationally known churchman).

In the early days of America, new settlers in a community satisfied their religious needs by banding together, organizing a church, and building a house of worship.

If they were to participate in formal worship services, they had to take matters in their own hands. There were no churches available. They had no choice but to build their own.

Today, because of our constantly shifting population, equally large numbers of settlers are moving about. As a result many of our so-called rural and suburban churches now find themselves so surrounded by new residences that they are unable to accomodate their increased membership .. not to mention the even greater membership potential afforded by the constant stream of new settlers.

At first thought, it would appear that these people .. like their ancestors .. would solve their problem by building their own churches.

However, this is not the case. Most of these families have moved from established communities in which the churches were adequately equipped.

They take it as a matter of course that church will be available for worship; that their children will be able to attend a spacious, well-equipped Sunday School, just as they were able to do when they were children.

If they find that this it not the case .. that the nearest church of their denomination is overcrowded and in desperate need of increased facilities .. they may lose faith and gradually drift away from the church.

Therefore, churches in rapidly growing communities must do everything possible to accomodate these new families .. to keep these fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters in the church. Most of them try. But too many fail because of faulty planning and poorly conducted building fund programs.

But they do not need to fail. There are many heart warming stories of churches who have faced their building problems with realism and courage .. and are happier more productive and more vigorous congregations because of this richly rewarding experience. One of the most interesting of these concerns the Salem Methodist Church, Evansville, Ind., of which the Rev. Robert C. Holmes is pastor. His church is in the fastest growing section of Evansville.

Thrust into circumstances like those outlined above, the Rev. Mr. Holmes told me recently, a church can easily develop an inferiority complex. There is a strong tendency for the church to understimate its own strength. This will in turn lead to shortsighted planning (sometime to relieve the present strain) whereas good planning, wise calculation of future growth, and faith in the living God will warrant the undertaking of something more adequate and more apt to draw newcomers from the growing community.

The Indiana pastor didn't underestimate his potential. He knew that his congregation would support a constructive program because members realized the great need for expansion.

But the Rev. M. Holmes and the layleaders of his church knew better than to start talking of building plans and architect's drawing usntil first determing how much the congregation was able to spend on new church facilities.

They found out how much money was available by canvassing every member of the church for pledges. They gave every family an opportunity for usefulness but javoiding bogging down the canvass with secondary matters, such as building plans, which so often create dissention in a congregation even long before the money has been raised.

The 113 member families in this congregation pledged more than $61,000, which was about $20,000 more than the Rev. Mr. Holmes had hoped to raise at best. This victory served to let many of the new families in the area know that Salem Methodist was an active church, planning well for the future .. a fine family church. Since the canvass was conducted, membership has been constantly increasing.

Here is how the Rev. Mr. Holmes sums up results of the every member canvass conducted in his church:

"As is so often the case, the by-products are worth more than the main product. One cannot overlook $60,000, but what is worth infinitely more is the increase in church attendance, the new enthusiasm, the new leadership which has been uncovered and made available for other phases of our work, and the joy one senses when people have so honored God with their substance that the regular collection has been changed into 'An Act of Worship' in which worshippers are actually acknowledging God."

Report From Germany

U. S. TROOPS NO LONGER FACE JOB OF PATROLING BORDER

By John Collins
Foreign Correspondent

Heilbronn, West Germany.- U. S. troops no longer patrol the borders of West Germany, where a road, or a boundary line, is all that separates the free world from the world of communism.

The granting of sovereignty to West Germany ended the exclusive responsibility of the democracies to protect West German's eastern frontier, although the job of patroling these frontiers had been turned over, increasingly, to West Germans in recent years.

Americans have overwhelmingly agreed West Germans made excellent patrol guards for the border. They do their job efficiently, agressively and show no fear of the communists. Even before the end of the official occupation status, therefore, West Germans were recruited for border patrol work.

Before that time, when Americans patroled the borders which came closest to the chart of communism, incidents sometimes occurred between Red border patrol troops and U. S. forces. Once—and perhaps more often— the Czecks and their Russian masters sneaked across a road which was the border and strung almost-invisible wire in the path of U. S. jeeps, which patroled that sector.

The idea was to catch the Americans unaware and behead, or injure, them. In that case, the Americans did not retaliate, although many would have liked to. Instead, a little later, the American patrol was moved 1,000 yards from the road that was the actual border, to prevent incidents.

Germans used as patrol troops exhibited early a fine spirit for the job. And as they became increasingly used, U. S. troops were concentrated in interior locations. Thus, when sovereignty became effective recently, German troops took most part — merely continuing what they had been doing when U. S. troops remained at the bases.

Border patrol is now the responsibility of the German government. The days of the U. S. patrol are over, after several years of tense, sometimes dangerous, on the part of the U. S. control groups. No one is sorry it is over.

BEES BUZZ IN BE

Washington, D. C.- A swarm of bees, a swarm of bees on McKinley Home Branch Road. Agriculture officials have been informed. 50 bees were on the box, and probably more. Authorities had to call in a bee keeper who could handle bees without getting stung. Insects from the hive had to do last year.
